BI-AURA THERAPY

WORDS: VIRGINIA KERLEY ILLUSTRATION: TRINA DALZIEL

Bi-aura therapy is relatively new to the UK and only arrived in London two years ago. It works by energy-sensitive therapists feeling the energy flow around the body and then manipulating it to restore balance.

My first session with bi-aura practitioner Dan Kahn started with a chat about my general health, lifestyle and emotional state. Then Kahn analysed the energy states in my chakras (energy centres) through 'deep scans'. This wasn't good news for me, as it seemed my chakras were either sluggish, 'mushy' or spinning round in the wrong direction (anti-clockwise). One was even totally blocked.

The only chakra that seemed in order was my root chakra, which is concerned with the home environment and feelings of security. Even so, Kahn picked up on my concerns for the future in this area, which is something I do occasionally worry about, though I rarely let it prey on my mind.

After analysing the state of my energy flow, he started on the detox process. This took the form of a series of fluid sweeping lyrical gestures around me, similar to Tai Chi. Kahn gathered the blockages of energy and pulled them away, banishing them with a brushing clap. I had been suffering from stress headaches, which are apparently caused by an energy imbalance. To correct this, Kahn put a cool hand on the base of my neck and the left and then right side of my head.

During the session, apart from odd moments of feeling strangely light-headed, I didn't experience any other physical sensation.

Movement of energy can cause different reactions when pockets of repression open up. Kahn has had clients bursting into tears, singing a tune, regressing to four years old and even tasting cheese during the therapy.

I left feeling as if I had been toasted in a golden warm blanket. By the end of the fourth session I felt more confident and found myself dwelling less on issues that had been occupying my mind. The final deep scan revealed that all seven of my chakras were spinning freely and in the right direction. I don't know what long-term emotional or physical effect this treatment will have on me, but, for now, I'm feeling confident, energised and calm. Long may it last. WV
